

BIODATA

Professor Christine Brown Wilson

School of Nursing, Midwifery and Social Work
Queen's University Belfast,
United Kingdom

Professor Christine Brown Wilson is a senior academic at the School of Nursing and Midwifery at Queen's University Belfast and holds an Honorary Professorial position at the University of Queensland. Christine has extensive experience in teaching and learning in the UK, Singapore and Australia and is passionate about translating research into practice. Christine is currently working with teams in Australia, UK and Asia using codesign methods to develop effective digital learning resources for learners in higher education and community environments.

As a Registered Nurse, Christine worked with older people, including those with dementia, in the independent and statutory sectors in health and social care. As a nurse academic, she has developed a relationship-based approach to care model that promotes both person-centred and relationship-centred care using a biographical approach to care planning. Christine has authored two books based on this model, one focusing on older people and the second using an organisational approach for dementia care. This model acknowledges the contribution older people and their families make in caring environments and supports staff in the application of practical strategies. Christine has worked with companies and health care organisations in the UK, Singapore and Australia in developing person-centred services.

See <https://pure.qub.ac.uk/en/persons/christine-brown-wilson> for more information and publication history.